Simulab team's visit to the Grey's Anatomy set.

It takes the average teaching hospital two years of budgeting and fighting for space, so how can Grey's Anatomy get a state of the art Surgical Simulation Lab built overnight? They called Simulab.

Last night's episode (March 22, 2007) of Grey's Anatomy featured a scene shot in the show's new set which depicts a Surgical Simulation Lab in a teaching hospital. In the scene Meredith Grey (Ellen Pompeo) practices a bone harvest on Simulab's Adult Surgical Head in a state-of-the-art simulation lab, which also features TraumaMan, CentralLineMan, and the LapTrainer.

Simulab's involvement with the show started last season, when Simulab's soft tissue models captivated the show's Medical Producer. In addition to supplying the Adult Surgical Head and setting up the Simulation Lab for last night's episode, Simulab has created a number of surgical procedures that are being used in upcoming episodes. You know our simulations have arrived, when we are teaching Hollywood's special effects teams a few things about simulated tissue and blood!

This has been very exciting for everyone at Simulab and we are glad we can finally share the news with our customers and partners. This event is also good news for the entire Medical Simulation community in that it is raising awareness to new levels of fidelity that are available in Medical Simulators today. These are not the plastic dolls of the past. They look and feel like real skin, they breath, and they bleed when you cut them.

If you missed last night's episode, tune into ABC tonight (March 23, 2007) at 8:00 PM for an encore presentation of Thursday's episode or go to ABC's website to view the episode online.
